LITERATURE REVIEW

Research paper titled "Effectiveness of Online Advertising" published in the International Research Journal Granthaalayah, the study investigates the efficacy and significance of online advertising, along with the factors influencing its utilization [1]. The research employs a Likert scale methodology to gauge responses, with a focus on the percentage distribution of participants based on their online presence. The findings reveal a distinction between individuals spending one hour online compared to those engaging for two hours or more. Notably, the majority of respondents exhibit a preference for products promoted through online advertising over non-advertised alternatives. Furthermore, the study concludes that, among various advertising forms, online advertising surpasses offline methods in terms of effectiveness.

Gokhan Aydm [2] explored the distinctions in attitudes towards social media advertising and the rapidly evolving realm of mobile advertising, acknowledging it as the latest and fastest-growing form of digital advertising. Their findings indicate predominantly negative perceptions of mobile app ads and Facebook ads.

In a separate study done by Belch and Michael [3] delve into the "Perception towards Internet Advertising," specifically examining the perspectives of three distinct demographic groups. The research aims to elucidate the relevance of online marketing and scrutinize consumer attitudes toward online advertising. Notably, the study reveals substantial variations in population beliefs and attitudes based on demographic variables, shedding light on the nuanced landscape of consumer perceptions in the online advertising domain.

Hanif et al. [4] emphasized the prevailing shift towards online advertising, highlighting its dominance across various internet platforms such as Email, YouTube, Facebook, Instagram, and e-commerce sites like Daraz.com. The authors assert that online advertising stands as a pivotal marketing tool in today's digital landscape, underscoring its indispensable role in capturing market share, a sentiment shared by most organizations. They contend that contemporary marketing research has undergone modernization, attributing this transformation to the profound impact of advanced communication technology on advertising practices, thereby influencing and enhancing buyer preferences [4]. Specifically, their research investigates the interplay between knowledge management, entrepreneurial orientation, and organizational performance in their investigation titled "Consumer Perception towards Online Advertisement."
